It’s time Consumers have access to Professional Data Security Services

With so many of our gadgets going online these days, credit-card and Social Security numbers, banking information, passwords, family photos, and more accumulate in places you might not expect.

You might be in the market for a new computer, tablet, or smartphone for yourself or a family member. Unless you’re a hoarder, buying a new device means you’ll likely be recycling, trading in, selling, or donating your old gadget. It’s essential to keep that sensitive data from getting into the wrong hands. The results could be devastating: Just ask anyone who’s been the victim of identity theft.

Erasing isn’t enough
Taking the basic steps—deleting data from or reformatting a computer hard drive, or doing a factory reset on a smartphone or tablet—might be enough to discourage identity thieves. But this approach is far from a guarantee, and it won’t stop someone who’s specifically after your files, accounts, or photos. And even if you find, identify, and delete all the sensitive files on your device, that doesn’t mean a savvy thief can’t recover them. Data-recovery software can be as easy to use as any basic software and app, and many programs are free.

To ensure that your files aren’t easily retrievable, you’ll have to resort to more drastic measures. Unless you are a savvy computer geek, you want to work with a proven expert.

Could that pile of old electronics gadgets cluttering up your office or basement actually be worth some money? To get a sense of the market, you can look up online the prices you might get for a used iPhone, iPad, Kindle tablet, and Samsung phone, but you will need to ship the product to them at your expense and then take whatever value they will give you once the product is in their hands. You will also need to trust that the buyer will be as concerned as you are about destroying your personal data.
